The Ocean as a Critical Infrastructure forms the basis of our dynamic global economy and well-being. One of the urgent tasks we face today is to stabilize security environment at sea and to establish global regimes for ocean management. In this sense, the United States and Japan, as major maritime nations and representative members of the democratic world, are required to take leadership in the sustainable development and the maintenance of the order at sea. In other words, the U.S.-Japan alliance, a key international public good for world peace, is confronting an ambitious challenge of playing a leading role in Critical Maritime Infrastructure Protection (CMIP) to address various ocean-related problems.
